Student thinks the Capstone is serious

BY KATIE SWALM AND ANNALIESE YUKAWA
Capstone Editors

Picking up the weekly Horizon, a freshman student immediately flipped the paper over to the back to review, which blasphemous claims had been reported on by the editors this week.

"Oh my goodness! Did someone actually say that?" he exclaimed to himself, referring to a previous week's article about the guy who came out as a homosexual by a veggie burrito. "I thought gays weren't allowed on this campus."

"Did you see this?" the freshman showed his friends at lunch, to which one of them replied, "That didn't actually happen, you know. It's a satire page."

"What?" the student said.

"Yeah," his friend said. "It's just critiquing the social dynamics of campus using gross exaggeration, hyperbole, and a good dose of sarcasm. Personally, it's not my cup of tea, but a lot of people read it because it's on the back page, and it always makes a good trash can liner."

"So they're basically . . . lying about situations and conversations that didn't actually happen to prove a point? That doesn't seem legal."

"Parody law, my friend," said the third year.
